To Whom it May Concern:

I bring an outcome-driven development mindset. Not only have I partnered with engineers, designers, and business stakeholders to shape product visions, translate them into actionable roadmaps, but been a Lead Senior Engineer over the years so I intimately know the products I work on and can lead Developers extremely well.

Across initiatives, I've owned product strategy and execution end-to-end: defining problem spaces and success metrics, prioritizing roadmaps against customer needs and market opportunities, and refining user stories and acceptance criteria to keep agile teams moving with clarity. I'm disciplined about backlog management and trade-off decisions—communicating the “why” behind priorities, sequencing technical and UX work to de-risk delivery, and ensuring incremental releases map to strategic goals rather than a list of disconnected features.

Customer and market insight are central to how I work. I've conducted stakeholder and user interviews, synthesized feedback from customer-facing teams, and analyzed product usage data to uncover pain points and opportunities. From there, I translate findings into crisp requirements and hypotheses, define KPIs and leading indicators, and partner with data/analytics to monitor performance post-launch. I'm comfortable iterating quickly when metrics or qualitative feedback tell us we're off track, and I treat usability and user experience as first-class citizens in prioritization, not afterthoughts.

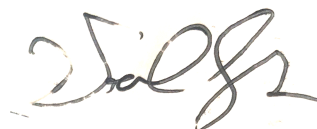

My toolkit includes JIRA, Azure DevOps, Confluence, Miro, Lucidchart and many many more tools I have used over the years. I am a huge fan of Agile Product Development; trained by Marty Cagan himself (Silicon Valley Product Group), he was one of the original proponents of the methodology.

My first job out of College was working as the Director of Communications for Emalfarb, Swan & Bain. This was back in 2005, and they are one of the leading National Law Firms for Construction Attorneys. I lead the development of their internal tools as well as external marketing. I know how to communicate to stakeholders, both internal and external.

Finally, I thrive in collaborative, work environments. Please contact me and we can discuss your needs and how best I can fit the role.

Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,

Daniel John Gonzalez
